IT IS reported that an unlikely development programme is being devised for top businessmen.

If they have a spare thousand quid they can spend time with endangered species at Port Lympne Zoo, where gorillas and tigers roam.

The idea is that living with endangered species will help the jaded tycoons to improve their emotional intelligence, which in turn should improve their management skills.

How would Alan Sugar fare faced with a 40 stone man-eating tiger?

My money's on Sugar.
